ABSTRACT

The U.S. colleges and universities offering non-sectarian educational programs in Jewish Studies rely on the support of their academic libraries for research materials and library services. For college libraries which use Library of Congress Classification scheme, it is a common practice to integrate "studies" resources into their general library collections. Since Jewish Studies sources span a vast number of subjects within all major disciplines, shelving integration leads to the dispersion of all relevant sources and such dispersion in turn leads to a variety of problems for library professionals and library users. For collection development librarians the problems range from lack of information about collection's size, strengths or weaknesses, and for library users interested in browsing the collection, dispersion of subjects creates a major roadblock. This practical guide aims at providing a solution to such problems. By identifying all relevant Library of Congress call numbers and the corresponding Library of Congress subject headings, the guide offers a simplified access to Jewish Studies sources in general library collections. It is arranged by four major discipline: Arts & Humanities, Social Sciences, Sciences, and General Works & Bibliographies. Within each discipline, specific LC call number ranges and corresponding subjects are listed. The subjects are further subdivided and precisely identified. The guide will assist collection development librarians, library liaisons, grants and fundraising professionals and especially the Jewish Studies faculty and students, in identifying and locating relevant sources.

INTRODUCTION

United States colleges and universities are witnessing not only a rise in new interdisciplinary studies such as Global Studies, Gender Studies, Asian American Studies, or Neuroscience but they are also seeing an increase in popularity of long established programs such as Jewish Studies. According to the information about Jewish Studies programs posted on the Association for Jewish Studies website, there are now over two hundred U.S. colleges and universities offering either study programs or undergraduate and graduate degrees in Jewish Studies. (AJS, 2013).

All academic college departments, whether they are offering courses in traditional disciplines such as literature, history, or philosophy, or as part of the interdisciplinary programs such as Jewish Studies, require a strong support from academic libraries. Such support must consider the research needs of the teaching faculty, the needs of undergraduate and graduate students enrolled in related courses, and the mandates imposed on such programs by various accrediting institutions.

Bopp and Smith (2011), in their introductory text on reference services intended primarily for beginning graduate library and information science students, succinctly identify collections, organization, and service as the " three basic functions (libraries perform) in order to fill the information needs of their communities. Each of these functions is extremely detailed and highly complex, yet all of the activities of the library can be reduced to one of these three factors" (pp.4-5). Therefore acquiring content across various disciplines, assuring orderly arrangement of materials, providing easy access to the collection, and offering reference services to users, becomes of utmost importance to the library and the institution it serves.

DISCUSSION

A common practice within the non-sectarian, U.S. academic libraries is to utilize the Library of Congress (LC) Classification system for organizing their libraries' collections. Within the libraries which follow this practice, interdisciplinary studies collections are often integrated into their general library collection. Since Jewish Studies sources span a vast number of subjects in all major disciplines, shelving integration under the LC subject arrangement umbrella leads to the dispersion of all relevant sources throughout the entire LC classification scheme. Such dispersion in turn, leads to a variety of problems for library professionals and library users.

Problems with the use of this popular system are noted independently by Chan (1999) and Elazar (1997). In her introduction to A Guide to the Library of Congress Classification, Chan points out that the "LC Classification was never intended as an embodiment of a pervasive philosophical system for classifying knowledge per se. Instead, it was originally designed and developed for a purely practical purpose, the effective organization of the Library's own collection – as it existed at the time and as it was expected to grow" (1999, p. 14). She adds that the original assumption "that the library serving the United States Congress would possess an extensive collection in history and the social sciences" and therefore these "are given a larger amount of space within the notational structure than are the classes for natural sciences and technology" (1999, p.26). Similarly, other classes demonstrate some inconsistencies in the organization of major subjects. Chan points to Language and Literature Class P: "classification of literature differs from classification in other subjects in that languages and forms take precedence over topic" (1999, p.353).

Similar views were expressed by the authors of the Elazar Classification System for use by Judaica libraries. They note that the use of Library of Congress classification system "consist(s) of call numbers for the classification of Judaica materials in locations throughout the general system wherever they fit into the general scheme" and it "serves to scatter Judaica materials throughout a general collection" (Elazar, 1997, p.2).

Within the libraries which do not maintain separate and independent Jewish Studies library collections, it is not uncommon for collection development responsibilities to be dispersed among the subject bibliographers. In such libraries, public service librarians often hold the titles of "liaisons" or "coordinators", and are responsible for overseeing the growth and service of such collections. In many instances they lack the necessary book funds, and must depend on their colleagues for cooperation in acquiring and paying for Jewish Studies library materials. The following examples can shed light on this process: a Jewish Studies coordinator interested in acquiring a book about the history of medieval Jewry, will forward a request to purchase such a book to the history bibliographer, but a purchase request for a book about the representation of Jews in Spanish literature will have to be referred to the Spanish language and literature bibliographer. The subject bibliographers on the other hand, will have to consider the needs of their primary users, the cost of such books vs. available funds, and whether the specific purchase meets the collection development criteria of their disciplines. In all such situations, subjective factors might also interfere with the process. Success in convincing subject bibliographers to assist with building Jewish Studies collection often rests on the quality of a work relationship between the Jewish Studies coordinator and the subject bibliographers. Of utmost importance in establishing and maintaining a good relationship is clear communication, mutual respect for each other's roles, and the understanding of the common goals.

Gregory (2011), in her chapter on the future of collection development, refers to two points which are especially relevant to studies collections; "more emphasis on assessing the collections, (and) more outreach publicizing collections" (p.204). It is therefore imperative for liaisons or coordinators to be aware of, and to support their users' library needs. To that end the Jewish Studies librarians must seek information about collection's size, and be able to analyze collection's strengths and weaknesses. Unfortunately, the dispersion of Jewish Studies subjects within the LC classification system, along with shelving integration in academic libraries, present a major roadblock in gathering such information.

METHODOLOGY

The traditional academic library users, faculty and students, either browse library stack collections or use a library catalog for locating specific library books. The online public access catalog (OPAC) allows them to easily locate a needed source by title, author, subject, or keyword with ease. However, users who are interested in a comprehensive search of a specific discipline, find that OPAC's search limitations often lead to a tedious and cumbersome process.

In the past, librarians responsible for interdisciplinary studies relied on the use of library's shelf lists in tracking collections with significant subject integration. Arranged in order of books' call numbers, a shelf list represented an exact shelving location of every book in the library's collection. Browsing a shelf list allowed librarians to identify approximate size of the collection and helped them to ascertain the quality of the collection. However, as college libraries discontinued the use and maintenance of such files, the shelf list ceased to function as a useful tool.

In addressing the librarians' collection assessment needs as well as college users' interests in browsing library collections, it became obvious that what was lacking was a "user friendly" guide to all relevant Jewish Studies areas within the LC Classification System. By pointing to the specific Library of Congress call numbers along with the corresponding subject headings, such a finding aide would be able to assist the academic library users and the librarians with public service and collection development responsibilities.

To create such a guide, I used Classification Web (http://classificationweb.net), a database developed by LC CDS to enable access to LC Classification Schedule and LC Subject Headings (Hayward 2012). This subscription based resource links both of these tools, and it allows one to search by keyword, index and caption terms. However, due to its complexity and cost, the database is primarily used in technical services departments and as a learning tool within the library and information science graduate curriculum.

Prior to searching Classification Web, a literature search on the topic of Jewish Studies collection development was completed. The two databases consulted were ProQuest's Library and Information Science Abstracts (LISA), and EBSCO's Library & Information Science Source. The search results identified references to articles dealing with Jewish Studies subject headings but unfortunately the intended audience tended to be technical services, rather than public services librarians.

Of greater assistance was Galron-Goldschlager's (2000) guide to Jewish Studies subject headings. A focus on the terms the author listed in his work as "see references", "broader" and "related", brought to view the extensive distribution of the LC subject headings.

The next step was to compile an extensive list of subject terms, identify the terms' common roots, as in ex., Jew, Jew-ry, Jew-s, or Jew-ish and search the Classification Web for truncated terms. The database was further mined with these terms as "caption", "index" and "keyword" terms. The extracted classification numbers for all the terms obtained via this method were gathered and analyzed for duplication. A list of classification numbers along and the corresponding subject headings was then created.

In progressing with the project, the extent of the comprehensiveness of the work needed to be reevaluated. Having identified public service librarians, along with faculty and students, in non-sectarian college libraries as the intended audience, a balanced presentation of all subjects was required. With that in mind, a decision was made that the coverage of two subject areas, Judaism and Law, both of which receive extremely detailed analysis within the LC Classification Scheme, will be covered in less detail here.

The very specific "stand alone" class of "BM", representing the subject of Judaism, is readily available, is self- explanatory and easy to browse without additional assistance from this guide. However, the opposite is true of law within the "K" class. The extreme specificity of LC's coverage of this subject makes it a less useful tool for the academic users. Since it is more common for the law libraries rather than the college libraries to be interested in the exactness of the subject headings within the law discipline, the mining of the "K" class was made more general and focused on the needs of general academic library users.

Once all the relevant LC class numbers and their subject headings were extracted, the list was organized in the order of LC classification scheme. To further assist the users interested in locating information within the broad academic disciplines such as Arts & Humanities, Social Sciences, Sciences, and General Works & Bibliographies, a general outline of corresponding classification numbers and subjects was also created.

CONCLUSION

The appended, detailed guide is the end result of the project. It presents prospective users with a variety of benefits which range from offering a simplified access to all relevant LC classification numbers and the corresponding subject headings, closing the existing bibliographic gap within the areas of Jewish Studies and Library and Information Studies, to providing an easy solution for busy academic librarians in guiding users to relevant resources and for promoting collection strengths to the Jewish Studies faculty.

Additionally, this practical guide can assist librarians during the accreditation process by helping them to identify the size and strengths of the collection. And finally, it has the potential to serve as a standard public relations tool for library directors, Jewish Studies directors, or development personnel interested in identifying specific areas in need of funding either from private donors, or when seeking grants or private endowments.

In the concluding chapter of Interdisciplinarity & Academic Libraries, which focuses on the future of interdisciplinary studies, Gibson (2012) points out that in order for libraries to "become an essential partner in research processes, in curriculum design and development, such partnerships depend on a firm grounding in how the libraries can add value in the knowledge creation process and sustain attention in a fragmented academy and among researchers...who want information delivered to them with little interaction, and in the most readily usable format for them" (Gibson, 2012, p.216). He summarizes that the eventually, with the "advent of RDA and the shift from older taxonomies such as LCSH" (p.216), interdisciplinary information will become more accessible to library users. That's very encouraging but that's in the future. Until such time, created guide has the potential to fulfill the mission referred to by Gibson and cited above. This guide therefore, will easily assist all academic library users in discovering and identifying sources within one of the major areas of interdisciplinary studies – The Jewish Studies.
